Of sixty-two recorded community settlements in the history of the United States, only five managed to exist over thirty years. These five were based first on religious principles, and the community idea was only secondary. Twenty-eight of these settlements founded in all faith by followers of Robert Owen, or Tourier or Cabet fell through in less Fourier, or Cabet fell through in less than a year. In almost every instance outside. the colonies that the ardent theorists the colonies that the artest theorem is a wilder-tried to establish were placed in a wilder-ness, and the pioneer conditions were too severe and life too primitive for the men meler settled in Ohlo. They were at first and women to overcome. Often the community life appealed to prospective members as a place where they could live the property seemed to depreciate in good stage management. Indeed, there easily with little work, or by letting the value. As the younger members grew up is not a dull moment in the piece. It is other members do the work. Each member places in the common stock an amount varying from $2,000 to $80,000, and should he become dissatisfied, is permitted to withdraw the exact amount invested, though, sometimes, at the discretion of the board, he may be allowed a small interest on the amount. The Amana community owns about 25,000 acres of land, and several mills, including those for the manufacture of calleo and woolen for the manufacture of called and woolen goods. Besides working all their own adult members, they employ about 200 outsiders. They have no child labor in their mills, and have seats arranged for

As individuals, the Amanaites have not so much land apportioned to them as other residents of Iowa, yet a a people they seem to be happy, peacefu and contented. Their 26,000 acres of lan are valued at $40 an acre, and they have over 5,000 acres of it under cultivation year, their buildings are valued at $400,000, and their live stock at $70,000.

The most widely known of the success being about 1,000, and their communities time. may be found in Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Ohio, Kansas, Georgia, and Florida. They came first from England in 1774, "Mother Ann" Lee bringing over three or four to establish her faith in the New World. They settled in New York, and, like all other small sects, were persecuted by the larger religious denominations. By 1807 they had extended their membership as far West as Ohio and Kentucky. They live simply and quietly, devoting their the pursuits of agriculture and manufacture. They practice celibacy, and recruit their members from the outside. adopting children and bringing them up in Ephrata, on Cocalico Creek, in Lancaster County, Pa., though rich in poetic history and romance, is one of the passing communities. Through Conrad Beissel, a native of the Palatine, a body of Germans established this most unique of Protestant communities, for this is the one where an order of monks and nuns practiced mediaeval austerity in the very heart of a new world that was refuge for believers in the Reforma-ion. Their neighbors were members of the order known as "The Woman of the Wilderness," or "The Order of the Soli Wilderness," or "The Order of the Came came tary." In fact, so many Germans came tary." to join these earlier communities that Benjamin Franklin seriously feared that Pennsylvania would become a German province. Years ago the community num-bered several hundred. Now a mere handful holds the thread of the romantic past to knit it with the present. In for-mer years there were five large mills where corn was ground, timber cut, cloth fulled, and oil pressed from linseed. Of these only one stands to grind flour and meal for the neighborhood.

Once low-roofed community houses sheltered cowled priests, who bent over illuminated manuscripts with the patience and skill of the cloistered men who preserved learning for all the world during the Dark Ages. In one of these simple cells the Declaration of Independence was translated into French and German by a gifted scholar in the monastic habit, while Congress awaited the work to send to foreign shores. Here the wounded from Germantown and Brandywine were gathered in the days of the Revolution, and in the secular burying ground hard by the Continental soldiers who fell in the war were buried. To-day a few earnest people keep up the old faith with only a semblance of ful communities, the Harmony Society, of Pennsylvania, and the Separatists of Zoar, Ohio. The Harmonists left the established church of Germany and came
